PRADA: THE BELT

The Prada man this season is a nomad man. A fancy, nylon-clad nomad man who wears his possessions on his body and carries them with him wherever he goes. On his back is a backpack, from which hangs a change of shoes, and round his waist sits a belt, used not to hold up trousers, but more as a way of carrying more things on his person. Belts, we recently read, have been used by man for thousands of years in different ways. And the modern-day belt can be very useful in a survival situation. A sturdy, durable belt, "will be the best device you have to carry primary items that you need quick access to, such as a handgun, spare ammunition, a knife, flashlight, hatchet". You can use it as a weapon should you find yourself face to face with danger in the wild. Sharpen the buckle with a rock and it will serve as a whip-like weapon, or punch a few holes in it and "use it to fasten a knife to the end of a pole to make a spear". A weapon in the wild can also be used for killing your next meal. There is no Tesco Metro in the jungle. Should the next meal happen to be rather large and bulky to transport back to your camp, you can fasten your belt around it and pull it behind you. Alternatively, you could also just stay at home and use your belt for its traditional purpose: keeping your trousers up.

TEN LOVES

Text Garth Spencer

PRADA: GOT YOUR BACK

"I wanted to do something that was nearly impossible," said Miuccia Prada. "Make nylon luxurious." When Prada's nylon-bag range was released in the late 1970s, the brand elevated the fabric to cool and vice versa. Together, they became the epitome of modern sporty living. The sleek finish teamed with the matt crosshatched Saffiano leather was a marriage of two worlds: commercial and creative. The bags revitalised modern travel, flattening steamer trunks in their path and making the world of luxury accessible to all. Well, nobody wants to carry a plastic bag around all day, do they? In its nylon form, the backpack has become one of the most iconic symbols of Prada. Could we liken it to the invention of the wheel for fashion wearers? When cave man first devised the system of strapping dead prey to his back to drag it back to his dwellings, did he know what he was starting? Obviously, man became more decorative and less barbaric, with supermarket visits now being the closest we get to our hunter-gatherer roots. And the Prada backpack has become more decorative, too: just look at the fancy patterns and Navajo-like design of this one. Today's commuters and weary travellers could not imagine a journey without one – what other tool for living helps keep both hands free for mobile devices and further purchasing?

THE LIFE AQUATIC

Inspired by the underwater world of scuba diving, genius Miuccia Prada designed a neoprene boot adorned with contrasting color zips, elastic edges, nylon tape, and rubber velcro. Puddles won't know what hit them.

PRADA

Bulging backpacks, clip-on torches, cagoules, sock-and-sandal combos – the key pieces from Prada's SS17 menswear collection foreground a sense of practical, weather-proof utility that wouldn't look out of place in a mountain campsite. Hyper-saturated shades and mish-mashed patterns of everything from florals to thermal-imaging shapes lend the collection a textured, evocatively disparate feel. And if you add just one piece to your shopping list, make it this nylon gabardine hat.
